

Masked

The reason I don't have a mask is because I realized a long time ago that pretending to be something or someone you're not, doesn't get you anywhere. Because regardless of how you feel/act someone's not going to like it, so I'd rather be hated for who I really am then hated for something I'm not.

Everybody has haters, given some might not like you just because you're always positive and giving back to the less fortunate. They might be angry that you're trying your best to be a good person to others in need, when they can't.

I personally have taken full responsibility in the actions that have gotten me locked up. I've already apologized to the judge, victim, and my family for the poor decisions I made in the past.

From The Beat: We respect your choice to be yourself through and through, regardless of the hate you get. The ones who hate might hate because the positivity you bring reminds them of what they are afraid to become. There is much wisdom in your words.
